Facts of Case

The worker submitted a request for a determination of worker status in regard to services performed for tax years 2018 and 2019 as a cook. The firm issued the worker Form 1099-MISC for the years in question. The worker filed Form SS-8 as she believes she erroneously received Form 1099-MISC.

The firm's response was signed by the Finance Team Leader. The firm stated that the business is a school and church. The worker performed services as a substitute kitchen help. The worker was classified as an independent contractor due to her services being temporary. There was no written agreement between the two parties.

The firm provided specific training and/or instruction to the worker. The worker received work assignments from the firm and the firm determined their methods of completion. The worker relied upon the firm to resolve her problems and complaints. Reports and meetings were not required. The firm was responsible for hiring and paying substitutes or helpers. The worker was required to personally perform services.

All materials, supplies, and equipment were provided by the firm. The worker did not lease equipment, space, or a facility. The firm established the level of payment for the services provided to its customers. Customers paid the firm and the worker incurred no expenses in the performance of services. The worker was paid an hourly rate of pay; drawing account for advances was not allowed. The firm did not carry workers compensation insurance on the worker.

The firm stated that benefits were not provided to the worker. The work relationship could be terminated by either party without incurring liability or penalty. The firm was not aware if the worker advertised or performed services for other firms at the time of their work relationship but did not require approval before the worker could do so. The work relationship is ongoing.

Analysis

Generally, the relationship of employer and employee exists when the person for whom the services are performed has the right to control and direct the individual who performs the services, not only as to what is to be done, but also how it is to be done. It is not necessary that the employer actually direct or control the individual, it is sufficient if they have the right to do so.

Section 31.3121(d)-1(a)(3) of the regulations provides that if the relationship of an employer and employee exists, the designation or description of the parties as anything other than that of employer and employee is immaterial. Thus, if an employer-employee relationship exists, any contractual designation of the employee as a partner, co-adventurer, agent, or independent contractor must be disregarded. Furthermore, whether there is an employment relationship is a question of fact and not subject to negotiation between the parties.

Therefore, the payer's statement that the worker was an independent contractor is without merit. For federal employment tax purposes, it is the actual working relationship that is controlling and not the terms of the contract (oral or written) between the parties.

Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the instructional services performed by the worker were integral to the payer's business operation. The payer provided work assignments by virtue of the clients served, determined the methods by which assignments were performed, and assumed responsibility for problem resolution. These facts evidence the payer retained the right to direct and control the worker to the extent necessary to ensure satisfactory job performance in a manner acceptable to the payer. Based on the worker's education, past work experience, and work ethic the payer may not have needed to frequently exercise its right to direct and control the worker; however, the facts evidence the payer retained the right to do so if needed.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the payer assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the payer has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings. In this case, the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Based on the rate of pay arrangement the worker could not realize a profit or incur a loss.

Factors that illustrate how the parties perceive their relationship include the intent of the parties as expressed in written contracts; the provision of, or lack of employee benefits; the right of the parties to terminate the relationship; the permanency of the relationship; and whether the services performed are part of the service recipient's regular business activities. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the payer's business. Both parties retained the right to terminate the work relationship at any time without incurring a liability. There is no evidence to suggest the worker performed similar services for others as an independent contractor or advertised business services to the general public during the term of this work relationship. The classification of a worker as an independent contractor should not be based primarily on the fact that a worker's services may be used on a temporary, part-time, or as-needed basis. As noted above, common law factors are considered when examining the worker classification issue.

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the payer had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
