The worker initiated the request for a determination of her work status as a driver in tax years 2018 and 2019. The firm's business is described as pre-paid transportation of children up to age 14 and medical transportation for everyone.

The firm's response was signed by the firm's CEO. The firm's business is a children's transportation business; non-emergency medical transportation providers. The worker provided services as a driver; driving passengers from one location to another.

The worker stated she received specific training and instructions from another employee of the firm. The job assignments came from the firm. The firm determined the methods by which the worker's services were performed. Any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were directed to the firm for resolution. Her services were rendered by arriving at the firm's lot and picking up the assigned vehicle and providing her services between 6:30am to 7pm, following the schedule she was given. The worker was required to perform the services personally; any additional personnel were hired and paid by the firm.

The firm responded that the worker was only told how to use the in-vehicle GPS device to accept and receive pickups and get gas navigations to locations. The job assignments were received through the Garmin in the vehicle. The worker determined the methods by which the services were performed. The firm stated that any problems or complaints encountered by the worker were resolved by the worker since the worker had the contact number of the customer. The firm responded that the worker was not given specific shifts, hours, or customers; the worker determined her schedule and availability. The worker was required to perform the services personally.

The firm acknowledged that the worker was provided with a vehicle and GPS, with the worker furnishing her cellphone. The worker indicated the firm provided vehicles, insurance, gas, uniforms, toll money, and car seats; and she furnished nothing. Both parties concur the worker did not lease equipment, space, or a facility, the firm paid her an hourly wage, and the customers paid the firm. The firm responded the worker was not covered under the firm's workers' compensation insurance policy. The firm and worker agree the worker was not at risk for a financial loss in this work relationship and she did not establish level of payment for services provided.

The firm and worker concur there were no benefits extended to the worker and either party could terminate the work relationship without incurring a liability or penalty. The firm stated the worker was performing same or similar services for others during the same time frame; the worker disagreed. The worker was performing services as a driver under the firm's name.

Analysis

A worker who is required to comply with another person's instructions about when, where, and how he or she is to work is ordinarily an employee. This control factor is present if the person or persons for whom the services are performed have the right to require compliance with instructions. Some employees may work without receiving instructions because they are highly proficient and conscientious workers or because the duties are so simple or familiar to them. Furthermore, the instructions, that show how to reach the desired results, may have been oral and given only once at the beginning of the relationship.

If the services must be rendered personally, presumably the person or persons for whom the services are performed are interested in the methods used to accomplish the work as well as in the results.

Payment by the hour, week, or month generally points to an employer-employee relationship, provided that this method of payment is not just a convenient way of paying a lump sum agreed upon as the cost of a job. In such instances, the firm assumes the hazard that the services of the worker will be proportionate to the regular payments. This action warrants the assumption that, to protect its investment, the firm has the right to direct and control the performance of the workers. Also, workers are assumed to be employees if they are guaranteed a minimum salary or are given a drawing account of a specified amount that need not be repaid when it exceeds earnings.

The fact that the person or persons for whom the services are performed furnish significant tools, materials, and other equipment tends to show the existence of an employer-employee relationship.

Lack of significant investment by a person in facilities or equipment used in performing services for another indicates dependence on the employer and, accordingly, the existence of an employer-employee relationship. The term "significant investment" does not include tools, instruments, and clothing commonly provided by employees in their trade; nor does it include education, experience, or training. Also, if the firm has the right to control the equipment, it is unlikely the worker had an investment in facilities.

A person who can realize a profit or suffer a loss as a result of his or her services is generally an independent contractor, while the person who cannot is an employee. "Profit or loss" implies the use of capital by a person in an independent business of his or her own. The risk that a worker will not receive payment for his or her services, however, is common to both independent contractors and employees and, thus, does not constitute a sufficient economic risk to support treatment as an independent contractor. If a worker loses payment from the firm's customer for poor work, the firm shares the risk of such loss. Control of the firm over the worker would be necessary in order to reduce the risk of financial loss to the firm. The opportunity for higher earnings or of gain or loss from a commission arrangement is not considered profit or loss.

We have considered the information provided by both parties to this work relationship. In this case, the firm retained the right to change the worker's methods and to direct the worker to the extent necessary to protect its financial investment and business reputation and to ensure its customers' satisfaction and that its contractual obligations were met. The worker was not operating a separate and distinct business; the worker did not invest capital or assume business risks, and therefore, did not have the opportunity to realize a profit or incur a loss as a result of the services provided. Integration of the worker's services into the business operations generally shows that the worker is subject to direction and control. When the success or continuation of a business depends to an appreciable degree upon the performance of certain services, the workers who perform those services must necessarily be subject to a certain amount of control by the owner of the business. In this case, the worker was not engaged in an independent enterprise, but rather the services performed by the worker were a necessary and integral part of the firm's business.

CONCLUSION

Based on the above analysis, we conclude that the firm had the right to exercise direction and control over the worker to the degree necessary to establish that the worker was a common law employee, and not an independent contractor operating a trade or business.
